Gap Inc. has for the first time offered international shipping to 55 countries, allowing people in Australia, Mexico, Brazil to order from its brands and allowing the company to test the market for its brands overseas.

The company said in a news release Thursday this marks the first time people outside of the U.S. can buy items online from Gap, Banana Republic, Old Navy, Athleta and Piperlime.

E-commerce division president Toby Lenk said the technology has evolved to where the company can meet the international demand. He also said online sales are a way to test the market for brands outside of the U. S.

The company partnered with international e-commerce expert FiftyOne on the effort. Customers can get their order totals in their own currency, along with international duty, tax, and delivery costs, with a guaranteed exchange rate.

FiftyOne will ship the items

FiftyOne's turnkey solution can help online retailers reach more than 1.4 billion online consumers in 91 countries.

Alice.com In The Wall Street Journal

The following are excerpts from a January 12 WSJ article by Ellen Bryon:

Makers of household products like diapers and detergents, eager to build links more directly with consumers, are about to get another option for selling their goods online. Alice.com, a privately held start-up that already runs an online market for household items, has unveiled a new service today providing merchandising, checkout and shipping services for companies that want to sell products through their own Web sites.

Alice.com's expanded tools for manufacturers follow announcements in recent months by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Walgreen Co. that they are increasing their online selling capabilities.

"Think about all the pressure [consumer-product makers] are under, from media fragmentation to retailers developing their own brands," says Robert Tomei, president of consumer and shopper insights for research firm Information Resources Inc. "They're losing the ability to maintain their brand equity; this is a way to re-establish their communication with consumers.

Everyone needs an Alice.

There is an old Chinese proverb that says "may you live in interesting times". Well I guess that two major economic "bubbles" in a decade constitutes interesting times. The first "Internet Bubble" has been thoroughly analyzed. But what about this latest "Financial Bubble"? The causes are varied and depending on your views hardly anyone agrees on what the causes really were. I'll take a stab at giving my view. First we had an asset boom/bust bubble fueled by easy money working through cheap credit making housing assets appear more valuable than they really were. Government policies to promote "affordable" housing led to loans being made with little or no down payment and sure to fail underwriting standards. When this bubble burst it brought down the entire economy. And even Warren Buffet says he didn't see it coming. Now the reaction to this recession has been extraordinarily tight credit, a deleveraging of the financial system, a liquidity crisis, high unemployment and a meager recovery (so far). What to do?

Well, I believe markets are quite resilient, but we must let them recover and promote a growth agenda. There is so much uncertainty in the business world today that leads to stunted growth scenarios in virtually all industries (except government!). The private equity industry will continue to play a leadership role in this recovery as it has in the past.
